This study was designed to evaluate the behaviour of polymer-screw composites and screws in newly formed bone. A new bone specimen was obtained from the tibia of goats. The implants consisted of polycaprolactone (PCL) screws embedded in a polymer matrix and reinforced with an erbium glass fibre (EgF). The screws and the polymer matrix served as bone substitute materials. Titanium screws were used as a control. The screws were used with a loading time of 24 weeks. The results showed that the EgF-PCL screw matrix was the most biologically active group and had the highest density and highest amount of new bone compared to the other groups. Titanium screws showed higher strength values than polymer-screw composite screws, but their strength values were not similar to those of the EgF-PCL group. The values found in this study were comparable with the values found for human bone.Q: Eulerian graph containing no isolated vertices Does there exist an Eulerian graph with no isolated vertices?
