A description of women's experiences of taking part in a trial of an interactive bed net. There is a need to understand what factors influence women's willingness to take part in a study of a bed net, and what influences participation in trials of bed nets. This study is part of a larger study examining barriers to use of bed nets in a variety of socio-economic settings. In-depth interviews with 27 women aged 15-50 who had slept under bed nets previously, or who were being prepared to use a bed net. Women's experiences of taking part in a study of a bed net were influenced by the acceptability of the bed net trial to them, as well as by their social and economic situation. The research was an intimate part of women's lives, and they were often very willing to take part. In contrast to the only other study which examined women's experiences of taking part in a bed net trial, they did not report negative effects such as ill health or fear. This trial provides an example of work that attempts to use qualitative research to enhance the acceptability and uptake of bed net trials.
