okay, here's the root of the problem: the xbox 360 controller has two buttons, one for l1 and one for r1. the pc headset system, while not truly a remote control, doesn't have a button for l1. so if you press the l1 button on the controller, you press the left-side stick, and if you press r1 on the controller, you press the right-side stick. and as we all know, the ps4 controller has a special button, the square button, that allows for aiming. the square button has its own stick on the ps4 controller, and on the xbox one controller, it's integrated into the stick. so in that case, the controller is setup with two l1/r1 buttons, a left and a right stick. and then you get a separate left and right stick for the square button on the controller. on the console, those sticks are mapped to the l2/r2 buttons on the controller. the control concept is different, it can be hard to decide which is the right button, especially for the shooter. if i had to guess about the different times i played, it feels like the controller set-up on the xbox 360 is more comfortable for aiming (using an analog stick) and moving around (using the right stick) while the ps4 controller is better for shooting (using a dedicated trigger button). tech: apple's ipad: 5 questions the industry needs answered apple's ipad is still in the early days, but all indications suggest the tablet-to-movie ticket box office is looking at only a modest $20 million this holiday season. it's the biggest tech launch ever, and part of it may come down to all the buzz and excitement that's generated -- even if it does all take place in the media's back yard. steve jobs was used to that. and apple, pixar, and walt disney even figured out how to get it right. 5 questions the ipad must answer
