Supporters and critics of Lightroom 5 always come up with magnificent reasons why users should stay current with its regular updates. Let's take a look at why Joe User may just stick with the old darn thing. When it comes to updating to Lightroom 5, the problem is that you need to upgrade all the individual plugins you're using. A lot of them don't make updates anymore, so you'll need to figure out which plugins you use to make sure you are getting the latest version. It is important to understand that Lightroom 5 is an entirely new application, and this is evident when you look at the big changes made to the "movie star" mode. "If you have been learning Lightroom, here's a great chance to jump into a much better version that is going to make a big difference to your skills." - Influencer, Courtney, "What is Lightroom 5"

"I've tried Lightroom and Aperture before but have always ended up abandoning them because I simply couldn't get it to work consistently. Lightroom 5 has been the most stable experience I've had with a photo editing application. Awesome!!"

With the new Program Plugin Architecture, new classes in the new program can be added to the main application. These classes can interface with the rest of the application to perform much needed tasks like download/upload, rendering operations, etc. The classes are bundles of JavaScript Object Oriented (OOP) code. They receive data from the main application in various forms, and then can use this data to perform the desired task. The class then returns the desired results to the main program. With the addition of Program Plugin Architecture, Photoshop Architecture is the external interface between the main Photoshop application and its plugins. It functions as a bridge between plugin and host application and allows interaction between the main Photoshop application and the plugin. It lets the plugin access and use the classes within the main application. In Photoshop Architecture, the main program communicates with the plugin through JavaScript Object Notation (JSON) messages. This enables the application to communicate with the plugin using various file formats that can be used when transferring data, like portable network graphics (PNG), binary formats, etc. This can be used with any kind of media. The JSON messages are passed between the main application and the plugin through the data and metadata store. These message instances can be created in the main application using JavaScript objects. The plugin can then respond with a specific message action to tell the main program what to do.
