yify Neurodevelopmental effects of antidepressant treatment in offspring of depressed mothers. Developmental effects of neuropsychiatric disorders may be modified by early stress, including exposure to maternal depression. Several brain-derived neurotrophic factors (BDNF) involved in neuronal and synaptic plasticity were found to be altered in adults and children with depression and/or post-traumatic stress disorder. We aimed to assess whether maternal depression during pregnancy could impact BDNF in adult offspring and whether some antidepressant treatments may modify this neurotrophic effect. In a prospective, controlled study, we included 71 adult subjects exposed to antidepressant drugs for depression (n = 29) or to mood stabilizing treatment for bipolar disorder (n = 42), as compared to healthy controls (n = 27). BDNF concentrations in serum were measured by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA). A significant reduction in serum BDNF levels was found in patients treated with mood stabilizing drugs as compared to healthy controls (P = 0.05). In addition, a significant interaction was found between paternal depression and antidepressant exposure in the mean change of BDNF levels (P = 0.04). Antidepressant treatment in patients with a history of paternal depression decreased BDNF. These results suggest that alterations in BDNF could play a role in the neuroplastic changes associated with major depression, particularly in subjects with a history of paternal depression.
