With jQuery's ajax method, we can specify the type of content: $.ajax({ type: "POST", url: "/url", data: {param1: value1, param2: value2} }); This can be specified via the "contentType" parameter. $.ajax({ contentType: "application/json", type: "POST", url: "/url", data: {param1: value1, param2: value2}, success: function() {} }); Is it possible to change the contentType during the call? For instance, say we want to force this ajax call to use JSON, even though the client has provided a text/html to send. In other words, is it possible to say something like this? $.ajax({ contentType: "application/json", data: {param1: value1, param2: value2}, success: function() {} }); Is there a way to do this? I don't want the overhead of having to modify the contentType property every time I use the $.ajax() method. A: Try passing it as a third parameter, a boolean indicating whether it should be treated as JSON or not: $.ajax({ type: "POST", url: "/url", data: {param1: value1, param2: value2}, success: function() {} }, true); // Tell it that it is dealing with JSON Q 0cc13bf012
