She moved us to a paid section. She moved the sections around and made things more approachable for people.” Bogle mentioned one of the most successful cross-promotions the magazine had was a group that Kristi created with Heels & Co: Working Moms Network. “Not only were we posting content for them but we also were setting up events and doing things to help them get to them,” he said. “The number one problem we had is that we had too many of these amazing women, and we never helped them get to this other group. And so Kristi had a group, called the Working Moms Network, to actually do that.” After eight years of what Bogle calls “crazy growth,” the magazine reached an inflection point. It had grown in size, following Heels & Co’s acquisition of Bogle’s company, Sprinkles, which provides them with a production and printing facility. “That’s the point where we were starting to feel, ‘What’s our niche? We’re growing. Can we change this? Can we use this stuff to be something else?’” That’s when Colindale stepped
