Given increasing use of non-invasive testing, we examined whether outcomes in patients with atherosclerotic coronary artery disease (CAD) can be improved by restricting coronary imaging to patients with clinical indications for coronary angiography (CA). Patients under-going cardiac catheterization at eight Danish centres between 1998 and 2009 (n = 11 680) with normal/equivocal CA and CAD defined as  $\leq 50\%$  stenosis/occlusion was included. A composite outcome of all-cause mortality, non-fatal myocardial infarction and coronary revascularization within seven years was compared between two groups of patients: those undergoing CA and those managed medically (n = 6000). We identified independent risk factors for re-admission related to heart failure (HR 4.5, 95% CI 3.6 - 5.6), cerebrovascular (HR 2.7, 95% CI 2.1 - 3.4), and peripheral vascular disease (HR 2.3, 95% CI 1.7 - 3.1). These comprised mainly hypertension, diabetes, and hyperlipidemia but only the risk factors remained significant after multivariate analysis. Patients with CA (n = 6000) were at significantly higher risk of death (HR 1.8, 95% CI 1.4 - 2.3), myocardial infarction (HR 1.6, 95% CI 1.1 - 2.2) and need for revascularization (HR 1.5, 95% CI 1.2 - 1.9). Therefore, a risk-based approach to policy in management of patients with CAD and normal/equivocal CA is
