Show HN: My MVP for a vacation photo album - hackabill ===== iandanforth It looks like photos can be dragged and dropped between albums. This is awesome and makes the UI feel really responsive! I'd like to know how/if this translates into something closer to 'albums' in Lightroom or similar applications. Does it keep the full resolution of the original photo? Would its algorithm know something about these photos and produce a single image with sharp details, or let those details be lost? Are you considering the other end of the application? What about collections of photos with different photos as the output? ~~~ hackabill A version of it is actually built and running in an iPhone app. The approach I'm using does indeed fit your question. It is designed to provide a single output, but it's tailored for the kind of photos you're used to viewing (a single, excellent output). The idea is that you can look at a collection of photos in a gallery and add them as "albums" just like you'd have in Lightroom, Picasa, or Google Photos. Drag them out and drop them elsewhere. They'll appear in any other album you'd create. The challenge is getting those detailed photos, when the device is physically small (and my coding is small). It's a challenge because photos are often taken with a crappy camera, and even when they're taken with a good one, they still look (in some cases) like snapshots. The result is that photos appear blurry, and the resulting output of an algorithm usually requires a lot of (Japanese name: 1931 tora tora □□1931 Tora! Tora! tora) is a shooting game for PlayStation 2 in which the player fights through waves of enemies attacking them in a series of missions, seeking to clear the areas before them, and attempting to sink the enemy battleship "Tora".

Gameplay The game is based on a shooting game genre, using two fighters (one pilot and one co-pilot), and with a large number of enemy aircraft, battleships and airplanes to defeat. Both players have identical aircraft, except that the co-pilot will have access to a small radar screen which is the sole means of indicating the location of nearby enemies. The aim of the game is to destroy the enemy battleship in a series of missions. When a mission is cleared, additional missions become available. The enemy ships are divided into three classes: fighter planes, torpedo planes, and aircraft carriers. The various missions can be unlocked individually by defeating specific enemy ships, though initially only the fighter missions are available. Each mission consists of a series of sections, separated by mid-mission rest periods; during a mid-mission rest, the player can check enemy radar and position their aircraft to take advantage of specific enemy weakness. A variation on this feature is the limited area; once the player has completed the missions inside a limited area, there is no more time to complete them, unless it can be completed with allied aircraft. The limited area system was implemented to prevent players who have completed most missions from achieving all of the game's goals by continuously replaying missions until they reach the end. Each mission features five stages, or stages for the player to complete. Players receive bonus points for successfully destroying aircraft carriers; these bonus points are then used to unlock further missions, purchase additional equipment, or start a career. The first mission in the game can be played for free, as opposed to subsequent missions
