Previous neuroimaging studies suggest that the human orbitofrontal cortex (OFC) is activated by both negative and positive stimuli, with a greater response in the latter case. However, these studies have relied on nonoptimal tasks that do not control for attentional factors or require a response. We examined whether the human OFC is more responsive to emotional versus neutral stimuli. In addition, we addressed the hypothesis that the OFC is differentially sensitive to spatial information. 2. Human subjects were scanned with functional magnetic resonance imaging while viewing a dynamic face/scene pair presented in the left and right visual hemifields. The images were of either a negative (exaggerated faces, scenes, and faces) or positive (normalized faces, scenes, and faces) nature. Neutral stimuli were composed of a sequence of a neutral face followed by a neutral scene. The stimuli were presented bilaterally for 1200 ms and interspersed with 120-ms fixation-crosses. 3. The OFC was activated in all conditions. In addition, a within-group analysis demonstrated activation of the OFC in response to positive stimuli in the left hemisphere and vice versa for negative stimuli. 4. A between-group analysis showed that the left (versus right) OFC was more active in response to positive than negative stimuli in the male subjects. In the female subjects, the OFC was more active in response to negative than positive stimuli. 5. Overall, the results are consistent with previous neuroimaging studies showing more pronounced activation of the OFC by emotional stimuli. However, in addition to orbitofrontal activity, the OFC also responds to nonemotional stimuli. The OFC responds to spatial differences in a more sophisticated manner. It appears to have the ability to respond to the spatial properties of emotional stimuli and to the emotional significance of such stimuli. The findings do not support the hypothesis of a "salience network" centered in the human OFC. 6. The findings do not support the hypothesis of a "salience network" centered in the human OFC. The OFC appears to
